Chris, a young African-American man, is going to spend a weekend at his white girlfriend's family estate. Worried about their thoughts and opinions of their inter-racial relationship, Chris initially reads their odd behaviors and interactions with him as an attempt to over accommodate for their secretly racist feelings. However Chris comes to find out that this family has much more disturbing intentions with him than he had ever believed.

What drew you to this movie?

The acting performances were incredible, especially as many of the parts were especially difficult to play. Allison Williams does an amazing job creating chemistry between her and Daniel Kaluuya, which significantly contrasts from the way she plays Rose at the end of the movie. The storyline and cleverly used foreshadowing quickly grasps an audience's attention. As well as Lil Rel Howery does a fantastic job at adding humor for some comedic relief to eventually pull the story all together.

Did it remind you of something that you've previously watched or read?

This movie reminded me of a newer film: Missing. It is a mystery with many unexpected plot twists, especially that of partners/family members disobeying one another.

To whom would you recommend this movie?

The movie Get Out would be great for someone who is very into the mystery/thriller genre. There is never a moment where the audience is not on the edge of their seat, feeling the emotions of the fictional characters in the film. There is violence, so this movie can be considered a horror. I would not recommend this movie to children as the higher concepts of racism will most likely not be able to be grasped, as well as there is some vulgar language and violence as previously mentioned.

Overall, did you like it and would you recommend it to others?

I absolutely loved this movie, and I would recommend it 100%. The writing, director's techniques, acting, etc. was completely brilliant. I wish I could go back and watch this movie again without knowing the mysteries/storyline.
